

Reclaiming Your Time

Hi BGiLDERs,

Last time, we talked about how you run your schedule, it doesn't run you. This week, let's take that a step further. Now that you've thought about your power hours and ways to use tech wisely, it's time to look at what's actually taking up your time and how to make it all feel a little lighter.

1. Track Where Your Time Really Goes

It's easy to feel busy without noticing where your time is really going.

For a day or two, try writing down what you do every hour or use your phone's screen time tracker to see the truth.

Then ask yourself:

What is helping me feel focused, relaxed, or get things done? What is taking away my energy or attention?

Awareness is the first step to taking back control.

2. Say "Yes" With Intention, "No" Without Guilt

You can do anything, but not everything.

Every "yes" to something less important is a quiet "no" to something that matters more.

Protect your peace. You don't owe anyone constant access to your time.

Give yourself permission to say:

"I'd love to help, but I need to focus on school right now."

"That sounds fun, but I need some recharge time today."

Boundaries aren't selfish, they're self-respect.

3. Simplify Your Schedule

Look at what you have to do: school, work, things you do for fun, and time with friends.

Ask yourself: What can I stop, give to someone else, or not do right now?

Your time is important, and you only have so much energy.

Make room for things that help you grow, not just things that make you busy.

Question for you: What is one thing you could stop doing this week to have more time for what really matters?

Share your answer in the comments! We are learning how to do less so we can enjoy life more.